We never thought our students could make it to the end when we first joined the project. Throughout the process, our students proved themselves capable of working independently and that they are able to find out ways to solve problems they came across. Although this ability did not come at the very beginning of the project, they managed to overcome unpredictable “accidents” without too much help from teachers when they persisted on their activities until the third month. A bonus from the project was that students admitted they overcame stage fright through presenting their project repeatedly to different schools, guests and adjudicators on the day of Presentation in the University of Science and Technology.

The project proved an effective means to help students work independently – an essential skill that every successful person needs after leaving school.
